yes they can do all the above until they have a flare up in that case they then would not always be able to advocate for them self due to how the illness effects them	1
They realise some dangers but not all and if they were distracted wouldn't be safe	1
The answer to all these questions for my son would be no as he has severe learning difficulties.	1
sometime she forgets to lock the door. she leaves on the cooker	1
only has a bit of understanding	1
not sure about any of above	1
None of the above apply my children have no awareness of danger or understand being non verbal I makes life hard for them to communicate or understand	1
No sense of danger, non-verbal, sensory difficulties, autism and challenging behaviour as a result of these issues	1
My children are vulnerable.. all of the above are none apical	1

Understanding and empathy and acceptance that I know my son	1
Speak to a person who has genuine interest in the people who have a disability	1
see a person	1
Knowing that you would actually be taken seriously. That the out come would be worth the emotional and physical stress that the person reporting it would have to go through. Stress makes conditions worse. So why put someone through the stress when nothing would probably be done about the crime that had taken places.	1
If my child had to report something themselves visual story boards would be an excellent help	1
I don't believe the hate crime they have experienced would be taken seriously enough outside of the school	1
Having a designated person in schools/ youth clubs to go to if you believe a crime has been committed would I believe encourage young people to report the crime.	1
Depending on the severity .. however I feel it's a joint effort helping other to understand what is like to have a disability ... creating awareness is the best move forward and educating others .. the simple things are easiest dealt with at the time .. in all walks of life we are facing explaining to others who just don't get it !	1

Social opportunities for autistic teens in the area or for smaller children for that matter are seriously lacking. This area does not seem to get the same support as other areas which I believe leads to feelings of isolation and not feeling safe. Education and individual support are key and safe spaces to access that support.	1
My son can't go for a walk down our lane safely because of dangerous banded driver. Drugs are being sold at several points in our local area. We have reported to police and now my child is called abusive names and offensive hand gestures made by the banded driver	1
More social opportunities for the teens in the town would benefit my children greatly as would greater education and training in the area.	1
More patrols up and down our road especially on weekends	1
more local police officers	1
I think prevention through education is way forward. Time people with disabilities seen as equals. Assistance dogs should be welcomed every where. Not just Guide dogs or ADUK dogs. Having a point of contact within PSNI night/ day. Was told I should make the person I care for known to local police because if they have a flair they can look as if they are high on drugs, or amnesia. Doctors are concerned they could get arrested or searched which would crush them, or scare them that they would run and then get done for resisting arrest. Police trained to look first for Medical ID band to make sure that the person doesn't have a condition that could cause them to look as if they had disorderly behaviour, when really they are ill. Perhaps a phone line where they can get support to cope with trauma of the crime. Person I care for has been stoned in the street by gang males, she was very ill at that time and obvious she had disability. Couldn't leave the house for 8 1/2 mths. It must stop	1
I think a mentor support system would be excellent for my child as she gets older	1

I feel educating statutory and community organisations would be an extremely useful thing to do and would benefit many with disabilities. I worry for my autistic children as adults in case they are misunderstood and it gets them in trouble when all they need is understanding 1

Every child, young person, adult with a disability is very different and this is a difficult one to approach to cover all aspects of need. Having that joint support is wonderful just making family's aware that help is there should and if they need it... creating relationships is an incredible support and very welcomed... I see other families with children with disabilities and I see life can be rather lonely at times, That arm of support is so important 1

A lot of older people like my family member do not wish to acknowledge disabilities or the fact that this makes them more vulnerable. 1
